Dynamic decision-making is interdependent decision-making that takes place in an environment that changes over time either due to the previous actions of the decision maker or due to events that are outside of the control of the decision maker. In this sense, dynamic decisions, unlike simple and conventional one-time decisions, are typically more complex and occur in real-time and involve observing the extent to which people are able to use their experience to control a particular complex system

This study analyses the medical consultation as a dyadic encounter and demonstrates dyadic OPTION as a possible tool with which to measure perceptions of shared decision-making. The dyadic OPTION instrument was developed from observer OPTION, which underwent extensive psychometric testing lending confidence to the foundation of the newly adapted tool. The limitations of this study include the simulated clinic; standardised patients may not always behave and react, as would a genuine patient.

The association between depressive symptoms and the negative perceptions of the decision process (e.g. perceptions of conflict, disagreement, becoming overly tense, avoidance) is consistent with previous studies on cancer-related decision making and communication (Siminoff et al., 2008; Zhang et al., 2010). Depressive symptoms were not significantly associated with perceptions of the positive aspects of the decision process in this study, which may indicate that the positive aspects (e.g ...
