Written by Gina Assaf (Creative Associates International) and Tania Lee (Cactus Group). Image courtesy of Creative Associates International. A human-centered design process is a critical step that is often overlooked when making important decisions in technology for development. In the development space, funding usually comes from a donor or an agency, and the service or products it benefits goes to a different place, local communities in need around the world.

In those contexts, human-centred design (HCD) principles can be a powerful tool to achieve a more nimble, user-centred and ultimately effective solution for the poorest of the poor. DFID's Amplify Innovation Challenge Fund is one of the interventions DFID supports to put this thinking into action. It is a series of eight open challenges focusing on sourcing early stage ideas, especially from small community-based organisations, to address a range of development challenges for which we don ...

'Ergonomics of human-system interaction, Part 210: Human-centred design for interactive systems' is a process standard aimed at people responsible for managing design processes. It presents a high level overview of the activities that are recommended for human centred design. But it's more than a boring old standard.

IDEO.org launched as a 501(c)(3) from the global design and innovation firm IDEO in 2011, and like IDEO, we practice human-centered design. In addition to actually making things to improve the lives of people living in poverty, we're working to get the social sector at large to take a human-centered approach to problem solving too.
