As result of pronounced extension of the δ -phase, Ni in contents of > 7% imparts austenitic structure to chemically resistant steels down to well below room temperature. Ni on its own only makes the steel rust resistant, even in high percentages, but in austenitic Cr-Ni steels results in resistance to the effect of reducing chemicals.

Austenitic 18/8 CrNi steels can be raised to increased yield point and strength with boron by means of precipitation hardening, but corrosion resistance is reduced in the process. Precipitation induced by boron increases the strength properties of high-temperature austenitic steel types in the high temperature range.
