But in professional and academic contexts, we almost always need to think about argument differently. When we argue, we argue about a shared problem. In academic argument, all of us are/or should be/more interested in finding the strongest solutions to a problem than in merely advocating for our own predetermined and unyielding position. In these settings, your arguments will work best when they collaborate with readers rather than attack them.

Why we argue & how to stop | Peaceful Living

In our animalistic past, we did in fact have to fight with others to protect ourselves, our family, our territory. In that sense, arguing or fighting is a survival instinct, a threat response. The problem is that during an argument, unless we are very conscious of our feelings, thought processes, prejudices, etc., then our brain automatically defers to that instinct.
